ClearStar.net Launches Developer Community Free Online Portal Brings Developers Together for Collaboration

CUMMING, GA – May 27, 2009 – ClearStar.net, the leading technology provider for the employment and tenant screening industry, announced today the launch of a new developer community website at <http://developer.clearstar.net>. Modeled after developer sites for other popular web-based applications, this free online portal will provide support for web and application developers writing to ClearStar.net Gateway Web Services.

Developers joining the new online community will find easy access to always up-to-date documentation, open source code and related developer toolsets, forums for developer collaboration plus monitored Q&A.

“The developer site not only provides a place for us to publish the most current documentation and provide easy access to code and related toolsets but it provides a forum where independent developers can share questions and concerns among themselves,” explained Ken Dawson, CIO of ClearStar.net. “Further, it establishes an easy-to-use environment for providing feedback to and getting answers directly from our development team.”

The site will also include a marketplace where developers can showcase applications they have developed using ClearStar.net Gateway Web Services to other members of the community.

“By providing a place for the development community to come together to share learnings and potentially build cross-organizational teams, we hope to be able to help developers drastically reduce their typical development time and associated costs in order to bring solutions to market faster,” continued Dawson. “As a result, consumers of the ClearStar.net system will see enhanced functionality, new features as well as better sites and applications that extend our platform to ultimately make their jobs easier and more efficient.”

Access to the new site is complimentary for all members but registration will be required to download code and participate in forums.

“Clearstar.net has long shared an open-source philosophy,” concluded Dawson. “As the demand for access to our core functionality increases, the opportunities for collaboration between the developer communities will continue to rise.”
